Chapter Heading poem - Ernest Hemingway poems | Best Poems
'Chapter Heading' is a startlingly powerful look at the eternal conflict between the spirit and the flesh, and man's complex relationship with God. Part of the poem's power lies, I think, in its very sparseness - a line like "shivering home to pray" says more in four words than many a more extended passage might have done, and does so with far greater an impact.

A little known fact about Hemingway and Canada: after the Cuban Revolution, he refused Washington's request that he denounce Castro. He was tricked into the Mayo Clinic and received electric shock "therapy" but continued to send money to the staff of his Cuban home — but routed it though Canadian banks.

The Wandering Minstrels: Chapter Heading -- Ernest Hemingway
Chapter Heading by Ernest M. Hemingway uses ABCBDB structure. The poem talks about the endless pointless thoughts humans ponder about philosophy, creation, and the idols we worship "devils' tunes." He proposes that we serve one god by day and another by night, how our interests and worship are divided between the two, and how we are prone to choose the easier way even if it is not the right way.
