In his own right, Marcuse articulates an analysis of subjectivity, criticality, and inclusivity that has powerful implications for adult education. Although Marcuse did not write as an adult educator or make explicit reference to the field, his concerns frequently intersect with those of adult educators concerned with how adults learn their own liberation.

Through critical interfaith education, students would discover that they have as much to learn from the stories of each other's lives as they do from the sacred stories passed on by our religious traditions.

The History and Different Critiques of Critical Pedagogy

Abstract. Central tenets of Freirean philosophy and pedagogy are explored and applied to the emerging field of older adults' learning (educational gerontology), a sub-field of adult education. I argue that many of Freire's concepts and principles have direct applicability to the tasks of adult educators working alongside marginalized older adults.

Eastern and Western scholarship and learning are often construed as the Confucian-Western dichotomy. In the context of lifelong learning, the Confucian philosophy conceptualizes learning as a lifelong process through which learners of any age learn to become a virtuous person and to lead a morally excellent life.

Crosscurrents: Reading in the Disciplines

In Critical Crosscurrents in Education, Collins sheds light on this link between critical pedagogy and postmodernism as he suggests that, like critical pedagogy, “postmodernist critical discourse is about the struggles for power ‘to be heard’ – about the empowerment of ‘other voices’” (76).
