Geology of the Solitario Dome, Trans-Pecos Texas ...

Cenozoic equatorial carbonate production was at its most extensive and diverse in the seas of Southeast Asia, yet the carbonates of this region remain poorly documented. This paper presents the first published review of carbonate deposition during the Cenozoic, collating sedimentological data for carbonate successions throughout the region.

The Mesozoic carbonates develop in passive margin condition. They generally form wide rimmed platforms and atoll-like structure. These structures are topped by erosional surface and surrounded by resedimented carbonate belts. The Cenozoic carbonates are quite unique in the Mediterranean as some are formed during the Alpine orogeny climax.

Geochemistry of tested fluids indicates a type III kerogen source. The simplest interpretation is that the system is self-sourcing hydrocarbons from interbedded coaly material that is observed in the wells and at outcrop. Reservoir pressures are anomalously low relative to the overlying carbonate reservoir systems.
